Excerpt: . . . and opened the old withered heart, and crept in and warmed me up till I dont feel this room a wilderness any more. -Aint we friends us, old and young Ay, Mr. Tucker; that we be; youre kind enough to let me. Fred spoke low, but very earnestly. Ive had a deal on my mind to say to you for long, boy;--a deal that I couldnt find how to say; but to day it seems some way come up into my very mouth, and it ill have made my heart lighter if I say it out. When you were all nigh starving last winter, --the time you came in just to toast a bit of bread, you thought--only its my mind that God sent you to warm up my old heart--well, when your mother was ready to broak down, she said you set her up by saying something about trusting God at the worst. Did I Ay; so she told me. Fred looked confused, almost ashamed at being confronted with the simple faith he had had not quite a year since. He recollected all now; recollected, but was ashamed of that very trust. Ben went on: And she said that the boy that spoke so would never go far astray--she took comfort about you. Dont be ashamed, boy. I aint ashamed--Id do anything, for mother--but Im getting big, and cant talk like that. I dont hold much with talking, but I m afeard you...
